Do you like to interact with people? Create and share informative materials? Educate and tell stories? Inspire others to become committed and enthusiastic land stewards? Then you might consider becoming a Bureau of Land Management (BLM) educator or interpreter.

BLM educators and interpreters work in some of the most beautiful places in the United States: public lands that serve as dynamic outdoor classrooms and centers for active learning. Their job is to evoke wonder and connection in visitors as they explore the natural and cultural resources on public lands. BLM educators and interpreters use hands-on demonstrations, storytelling, interactive games, and much more to spark visitors' interest and help them think about nature, science, and history in new ways. They also create multimedia and written materials, including teaching curricula, for use by educators and others.
