If you're interested in helping people and protecting the nation's natural and cultural resources, law enforcement on public lands might be just the fit for you!

Just like non-Federal police, Bureau of Land Management (BLM) law enforcement officers implement laws and regulations. But unlike most police, their "beats" are some of the most majestic landscapes in the nation. BLM law enforcement officers make public lands safe for backpackers, hikers, and other public lands visitors through patrols and incident response. In emergencies, BLM law enforcement officers are skilled in conducting search and rescue missions and working with officers from other jurisdictions to solve crimes. They also provide visitor information and even sometimes give educational talks to explain the BLM's multiple-use mission.
